Dear Madame Cassandra:
I am twelve years old. Three years ago my father went away and never came back home. So my mother and I were alone, but then she died and I didn't have any place to live anymore. One day I met the owner of a freak show and he tricked me and ever since then I've been forced to work in his awful show. My life is so horrible, sometimes I wish that I could die. I can't go to school. I can't sleep at night, I'm so worried. What will become of me? What should I do?

The curtain rises. At center stage stands a vase three feet in height whose mouth measures at about a foot and a half in diameter. Ittoku appears on stage and tilts the vase down to show the audience it is empty. Then he places the vase atop a large table beneath which there is nothing—no devices of any kind. Several feet behind the table hangs a white curtain from above. Six candles encircling the table are lit, and they illuminate the stage very brightly. Dressed in a suit and holding a red handkerchief in his hand, Ittoku steps into the vase and stands up straight The vase comes up only to his knees. As the crowd roars, Ittoku protests that it is too difficult to get into the bottle. But the carny barker standing alongside him objects, "You know you always like getting into the vase—what's this sudden reluctance?" The handkerchief clasped in his right hand, Ittoku begins to sink down into the vase. His shoulders disappear, and after lingering a moment at the edge of the vase, the handkerchief too disappears into the vessel. Suddenly the barker claps his hands and calls out to Ittoku. A voice resounds from inside the vase. As the voice continues to speak from within the vase, in the ceiling directly above a hole opens up from which Ittoku slowly descends, still holding the handkerchief in his hand. He stands again in the vase and declares, "You have seen me escape by ascension; this time I shall escape by descending." Immediately he sinks into the vase as before, but this time the handkerchief remains half in and half outside the vase. Again the barker claps and calls out to Ittoku. And from within the vase a voice resounds again. And at this very instant a man clothed in a beautiful golden kimono appears from stage left and steps up in front of the vase. It is none other than Ittoku himself. Breathless, the audience cannot believe their eyes.
